COVID-19 Potential Symptom Relief: The Cannabis Connection

Can cannabis relieve COVID-19 symptoms?

Yes, we know the pandemic has been canceled. However, the virus itself is here to stay, meaning the search for effective treatments and symptom relief for COVID-19 continues. One area of interest that has emerged in this quest is Cannabis and its potential role in mitigating the effects of the virus. Often associated with its psychoactive characteristics, Cannabis is increasingly being recognized for its medicinal qualities. The plant comprises two primary elements: THC, the psychoactive compound that imparts the 'high' associated with Cannabis, and CBD, a non-psychoactive component known for its therapeutic potential. It has been researched for its potential to help manage chronic pain, mental health disorders like anxiety and depression, and even symptoms related to cancer treatments. A new area of interest to researchers is the potential symptom management of cannabis in diseases like COVID-19. In severe COVID-19 cases, a patient's immune system often overreacts, producing excessive amounts of cytokines, also known as a "cytokine storm." This overproduction can trigger severe inflammation and harm to healthy tissues. Preliminary research suggests that cannabis could be instrumental in modulating this immune response. It appears to suppress the inflammatory response, which could potentially reduce the severity of this COVID-19 symptom. Cannabis's well-known ability to stimulate hunger and provide potential pain relief means even the most commonly reported COVID-19 symptoms may be reduced. Although these possible benefits are encouraging the research is still in its early stages, and further studies will be required.
